If every year you decide to let your players walk because you as the owner and GM decided that that player was not worth the contract, why should you get anything for that? Okay, someone drives up his price because they value that player more than you and now you cant match that contract and in turn your free agent gets snagged away. Why do they not have the ability to resign that player? For instance, the Ravens last year let Kruger walk because he received an offer from the Browns that the Ravens, simply could not match. Why in the world should the Ravens be compensated for having Kruger get "taken" from them? If the player is that valuable to your team or that irreplaceable you are going to pay him the money to stay.
