This isn about the Steelers, this is about a league that needs to fix a serious problem with its officiating. Some errors/mistakes are going to happen, but this has to be the worst officiated season I have seen in many years. Centralizing replays might help some, but full time year round officials, who get together as a group and review every game tape and get all of the officials on the same page..

Hopefully a kicker will kick the ball for a field goal, or better yet an extra point, and hit the post and make the goal posts move slightly and it will take 3 more minutes to move it back. Then Goodell will ban all kicks. If something else happens, he will just remove the ball from he game and they will play with an imaginary one, and the refs will just call the game however they want like they do now.

The replacement players, called to play on short notice and having little chance to gel as teammates, were widely treated with scorn by the press and general public, including name calling, public shaming and accusations of being scabs. The games played by these replacement players were regarded with even less legitimacy (attendance plummeted to under 10,000 fans at many of the games in smaller markets, including a low of 4,074 for the lone replacement game played in Philadelphia), but nonetheless were counted as regular NFL games.[2] Final television revenues were down by about 20%, a smaller drop than the networks had expected.[3] The defending Super Bowl champion New York Giants went 0 3 in replacement games, ultimately costing them a chance to make the playoffs and to repeat their championship. The final replacement game was a Monday Night Football matchup on October 19, 1987, with the Washington Redskins at the Dallas Cowboys.
