Running back Marshawn Lynch, deliberately or not, has created an air of mystery regarding pretty much everything he does, due in large part to an intense reluctance to speak publicly. He has decided to speak publicly for the first time about his decision to retire, with Showtime 60 Minutes Sports. And Lynch has spoken as clearly as possible about his future.

He's going to go at the opponent as hard as the rules allow him to every single time he takes the court. He'd be the exact same guy in an octagon, except he'd be attacking an opponent with punches and kicks rather than with physical defense and ball handling. And something tells us that he'd be able to take a lick or two on the chops as well, which is a very important part of being a successful MMA fighter.
