Teams have also gotten away with not paying compensation because they claim that the primary job of players is to attend camp and practices, and that games are only incidental to employment (ha!). For example, for years the Redskins got away with claiming that their employees do not work in Maryland because they are based in Virginia, and that their salary is paid for practicing in Virginia, not playing games. I think a court finally ruled against that in the last couple years, but I don know how it turned out.
