A halftime show is a performance given during the brief period between the first and second halves, or the second and third quarters, of a sporting event. Halftime shows are not given for sports with an irregular or indeterminate number of divisions (such as baseball or boxing), or for sports that do not have an extended period of stoppage in play. Ice hockey games consist of three periods, so there are in effect two halftimes at a hockey game: the first intermission is between the first and second periods, and the second intermission comes between the second and third periods.

This attitude has settled in with the game for as long as it has been played, that if a player thinks they can play. In America players of the National Football League are reveled for their big hits just as much as their impressive touchdowns; yet, the defining quality that makes them so famous is also what is taking a toll on their health as well as their lifespan. With the number of concussions the average player experiences, it is inevitable that players will have long term brain damage, which puts a restraint on their health and limits their lifespan.
