Expectancy Violations theory was created by Judee Burgoon in 1978. Since that time, Burgoon and a number of her associates have studied various messages and the influence of non verbal communication on message production. The theory was originally called Nonverbal Expectancy Violations Theory, but Judee got rid of the word nonverbal later because the theory studied more than just nonverbal communication.

On this play, James secured the ball, but as he reached over the goal line, it was jarred loose by the ground and became unstable in his hands. Based off the last seven plus years of this rule being enforced, I believed it would be called an incomplete pass the second I saw the replay. I had the exact same feeling when Dez Bryant infamously "dropped" the game winning touchdown in the playoffs in 2015 against the Packers..
