Look what they did to Andrew Luck. Remember, they have two weeks to game plan. Not even close. But what happens when the athlete doesn't make it? Then he becomes just another person in his early 20s without a college degree, looking for a job. But what if colleges were to offer the players an added incentive to stay, promise a type of salary so the athlete could make some extra money to help with his tuition cost, maintain a social life, and stay in school to finish his degree? Because even on a full scholarship, it does not cover the entire cost, the IRS taxes the scholarship leaving the player about $3,200 $3,500 short a year. This is why paying college athletes makes sense, because it will help keep young adults.
